The Nutritional Tidbit

Over 7% of the population displays sensitivity to the fillers found in vitamins and supplements. While allergic reactions are usually subtle, they can affect any organ system in the body including the brain which may, however rare, display symptoms such as fatigue, memory loss, depression, anxiety, hallucinations and insomnia. Most vitamins and supplements in tablet form contain some fillers. Fillers include binders, lubricants, diluents, disintegrators, coloring and flavoring agents.

Fillers are used for a variety of reasons: as a binder to hold ingredients together; as a coating for increased stability, for appearance, or to mask the taste or odor; a diluent to liquify; a filler to make solid; an enhancer to increase the stability of the active ingredients; a lubricant to make it flow well; and as a preservative to retard spoilage.

Small tablets may be manufactured using the cellulose derivatives (ethyl, methyl) as binders, however the larger the tablet, the more it requires the use of binders. Time-release often contain large amounts of hydrogenated oils to slow the level of disintegration. Supplements in a vegetable-based capsule, powder or liquid form do not have such requirements and are far less likely to contain additives.

Commonly used fillers in drugs, vitamins and minerals include: magnesium stearate, lactose, starch (Corn), sodium benzoate, BHT, BHA, polysorbate 80, microcrystallin cellulose, red dye no. 33 and 40, methyl cellulose, sorbic acid, talcs, and sucrose.
