What is DECT 6.0?

We have seen a lot of changes since the first consumer cordless phone was introduced in 1980 at around $300 and at just 27 MHz it gave them a range of about 100 ft. Then cordless phones progressed through the frequency spectrum to 47-49 Mhz, then 900 Mhz in 1980.

Improvements continued with the introduction of 2.4 Ghz in 1998 and then we got 5.8 Ghz 2001.

Then in 2005 the FCC cleared the way for DECT (1.9 GHz), the international standard originally called Digital European Cordless Telephone now known as Digital Enhanced Cordless Telecommunication to come to the US. DECT 6.0 is a relatively new protocol and frequency for cordless phones to operate on in the US although it's been used for a long time in Europe, and it provides many benefits over 2.4 GHz and 5.8 GHz systems. A few of those benefits are:

- No More Interference - unlike 2.4 Ghz cordless, DECT 6.0 phones are virtually immune to household interference, and vice versa. If you have a wireless computer network in your home, DECT 6.0 won't disrupt your internet use.
- Security - Encryption is a layer of security that standard cordless phones just don't have. As information and identity theft is on the rise, DECT encryption helps keep your personal communications safe.
- Call Quality - Extra security isn't just for safety, it gives you clearer calls without crossover traffic.
- Easy Expansion - Extra handsets are easy to bring into a DECT system, and you can even make internal calls to other handsets (on some models) in the house!
- Battery Life - A DECT phone will last as much as 30% longer than a 5.8 GHz phone.

Here at SGMC we are bringing in more and more DECT 6.0 phones that offer you the features you are looking for and the clearest and best cordless phone communication you have ever experienced.

It's Your Health

Republished with permission from Patrick Massey MD, PhD, Daily Herald Columnist, June 1, 2009

"Those who think they have no time for healthy eating will sooner or later have to find time for illness" (Edward Stanley, English politician and author, 1826-1893).

These words, written over a century ago, ring so true today. There is increasing medical research to support the idea that many of our chronic medical conditions are not solely the result of bad luck, aging or part of our genetic destiny. Chronic disease is, in great measure, the result of our nutritionally poor diet. Every year, more research shows that a truly nutritious diet may prevent a number of serious medical conditions, including Alzheimer's disease. Alzheimer's disease is now the most common form of dementia in the US. It may be that Alzheimer's is incurable; however, medical research strongly suggests that it may be preventable with simple lifestyle changes. Regular exercise of the body and mind as well as a diet rich in fruits, vegetables and omega-3 fats all seem to reduce the risk of developing Alzheimer's disease.

Now we can add resveratrol to that list. Resveratrol is a compound produced by plants and protects them from bacteria and fungi. It is found in many foods including grapes, peanuts and even red wine. Research has demonstrated that resveratrol has antifungal as well as anti-cancer properties. Some data indicate that, in some animals, resveratrol can prolong life. How it works is unknown but it seems to make cells function better.

Although much of the medical news on chronic disease seems to focus on new and better drugs, the more we look, the more we discover that Mother Nature has provided much of what we need for life-long health.

Sometimes, the solution may be as close as your garden or grocery store.
